

A new year brings opportunities for connecting with culture

As we look to 2021 for better days, we can see clearly that the wonder we experience through arts, culture, and science is central to our lives. With a year of shuttered venues, reduced capacities, and canceled events behind us, the value of these experiences were brought into sharp relief. And so was the value of the SCFD, the district you created more than 30 years ago. During this time of hardship, the district was still able to provide millions of dollars of operating support for the arts and culture you love, helping them weather these difficult times and emerge ready to return us to the places of joy they have in the past.

While we still have many challenges ahead, we also have many ways to connect with arts and culture still available to us. Our amazing creatives across the Denver metro area are finding their way through the pandemic, and in turn, helping us all find ours.

Don't let the first month of the new year pass without feeding your soul. Whether it's a virtual concert, an outdoor exhibit, or a safe indoor experience, you'll be glad you did.

We fund culture.

For more than 30 years, voters across the seven-county metro area have said yes to funding arts and culture. Last year, we were able to provide millions of dollars to support these organizations through a pandemic so they can continue to bring you the wonder you need.
