

Thoughts on freedom

During July celebrations of our nation's founding, our thoughts often turn toward the nature of freedom as it relates to the higher calling of our country's creed. We might also think about that concept in the context of freedom to live our lives to their fullest potential and in the ways we each determine individually, regardless of our abilities and challenges.

This July, we pause to reflect on the 31st Anniversary of the Americans with Disabilities Act. Signed into law on July 26, 1990, the act represented the first steps toward inclusion for the one in five Americans who live with some form of disability. While there is still much progress to be made, this first acknowledgment in federal law that discrimination in employment, public accommodation, public services, transportation and telecommunications would not be tolerated marked the beginning of real and sustainable change.

In the Denver metro area, this real change included the growth and expansion of the disability community across the arts and culture landscape. Organizations sprouted from this inclusive moment are now mainstays of our performing and visual arts offerings for all Coloradans. Here are the stories of a few who contribute to this shared experience. Meet Teri Wagner, a dance and performance pioneer and founder of Spoke N Motion, Jocelyn Roy, a working graphic artist at Access Gallery and Ben Raanan, the new artistic director for Phamaly Theater Company.

Board Spotlight

To help you learn a little more about the leadership of the district, we'll be featuring a brief spotlight on each of our current members of the SCFD Board of Directors. SCFD board members represent each of the district's seven-member counties and are appointed by the county commissioners in their county. In addition, the governor appoints four members.

The entire SCFD family would like to extend its thanks to outgoing board members Kendra Black, who represented Denver County and Carlos Martinez, who was a gubernatorial appointee.
