

Hispanic, Latino, Chicano, Latinx arts and culture expand influence, inform a deeper understanding of identity

In the Hispanic, Latino, Chicano, Latinx community there isn't always agreement on self-identifiers. Applying just one broad brush moniker can quickly wipe out thousands of years of ancestral tradition, rich and varied national histories and each individual's journey. Allow the individual to paint their own portrait of how they stand in their community and the world. But in their arts and culture community, there is a point of steady agreement, acknowledged for decades: Art and culture from the Spanish-speaking world deserves a larger seat at the table and deeper recognition across a broader spectrum of Colorado and national institutions.

Common to the community and its arts and culture writ large is a shared struggle to ensure their artforms are seen and heard and acknowledged. Like many communities of color who operate outside the European artistic tradition, the fight for visibility and acknowledgement has been a long road. But in the Denver metro area there has been a clear and ever-growing focus on developing both institutions to showcase that art and culture as well as a mentoring of younger generations to ensure these institutions and the art they showcase survive and thrive. Efforts have produced community museums, dance troops, visual artists among other creatives and has steadily fostered a larger community that is prepared to support those artists with their entertainment dollars and their time.

Dozens of artists, activists and educators from the community have worked toward this common goal for decades. Their progress has been hard won, but substantial, creating some of the longest-standing institutions of their kind in the country. Here are the stories of two long-time champions of those efforts.
